

Answers in the Key Module 3 Task 17 Video 8:

In smaller Eastern European countries, it is common to see famous people like politicians, actors, or business leaders walking freely in public without drawing much attention. People in these cultures respect privacy and tend to be more introverted, even when encountering celebrities. Direct or overly enthusiastic approaches (e.g., rushing to greet them) might feel awkward or intrusive. Celebrities might appreciate the recognition but prefer subtle interactions. You may smile or greet them without drawing too much attention. If they respond positively, you can mention where you have seen them in a polite, calm manner. Respect privacy and approach famous people in Eastern Europe gently. They value attention but prefer subtle, non-intrusive interactions.
